

SERGE GAINSBOURG

The Genius of Provocation

1969. Denounced by the Vatican. Banned by the BBC.
Withdrawn by its own
record label.

The Song That Was Banned Everywhere

Je t'aime... moi non plus

Written in one night, in 1967, for Brigitte Bardot — who begged him never to release it.

The first foreign-language single ever to reach number one in Britain.

A scandal that sells is not an accident. For Serge Gainsbourg it was a method.

Serge Gainsbourg — A Journey Through Provocation

Introduction to the Subject and Guiding Thread

A failed painter.

Lucien Ginsburg wanted to be a painter and believed he had no genius for it. He burned his canvases and turned to the art he despised: popular song.

A face he hated.

The ears, the nose, the heavy eyes. He called himself ugly all his life — and built an aesthetic, then a persona, then a monument out of that wound.

The thread.

Each scandal was staged, timed and exploited. The craft underneath was immaculate.

He turned his fractures into a signature — and his signature into a brand.

PART 1

THE MAN WHO HID

A Yellow Star, a Painter's Failure, and a Pianist in the Shadows

The Four Founding Dates

The arc of a life in four milestones.

1928

Lucien Ginsburg is born in Paris, 2 April, to Russian-Jewish immigrants.

1958

Le Poinçonneur des Lilas. A first album and a new name: Serge Gainsbourg.

1969

Je t'aime... moi non plus with Jane Birkin. The worldwide scandal.

1991

Dies 2 March, rue de Verneuil. Mitterrand: "our Baudelaire, our Apollinaire."

From the yellow star to the national funeral — and the wall that fans still cover in writing.

The Yellow Star

A Childhood Under the Occupation

Joseph and Olga Ginsburg.

Fled the Russian Civil War to Paris. The father plays piano in bars and casinos, and drills his twins — Lucien and Liliane — in Chopin and scales.

1942.

The boy is fourteen when he is made to wear the yellow star. He later says he wore it like a sheriff's badge.

What it leaves.

A lifelong obsession with his own appearance, a fascination with uniforms and transgression — and the 1975 album Rock Around the Bunker, which turns the trauma into cabaret.

He never spoke of the war with pathos. He wrote it into songs that made people uncomfortable.

The Failed Painter

Académie Montmartre

He studies painting, meets Dalí, and holds painting above every other art.

Around thirty

He decides he will never be a great painter and burns the canvases.

PAINTER

“Song is a minor art”

The verdict he repeated for the rest of his life — about the art he was good at.

The minor art became his masterpiece. He never forgave it.

1958: Le Poinçonneur des Lilas

A ticket-puncher in the Métro. A man who makes holes all day and dreams of one last hole — in his own head. A first single that is a short story, a portrait and a joke about suicide.

The new name. Lucien becomes Serge — Russian, severe — and Ginsburg becomes Gainsbourg, after the English painter Gainsborough.

Critics love it. The public does not. Too literary, too cold, too ugly for television. For ten years he will write mostly for other people.

He arrived as an author, not a star. The star would have to be manufactured.

Writing for Others

Gréco, Gall, and the Scandal of the Lollipops

The first scandal was built on someone else's innocence. The pattern was set.

PART 2

THE ART OF SCANDAL

Bardot, Birkin, Melody Nelson and a Reggae Marseillaise

1967–1968: Bardot, then Birkin

Two Women, One Song, and a Tape in a Drawer

Bardot. A disastrous first date, then a demand: the most beautiful love song he can imagine. In one night he writes Bonnie and Clyde and Je t'aime...

Birkin. 1968, on the set of Slogan: a twenty-one-year-old English actress with a wicker basket and a gap-toothed smile. She records the song with him in 1969.

The couple. For twelve years they are the most photographed couple in France. She is his muse, his voice and, as he would say, his masterpiece.

The Bardot version is a duet of equals. The Birkin version is a scandal. He released the scandal.

1971: Histoire de Melody Nelson

The Concept Album Nobody Bought

Twenty-eight minutes.

A man in a Rolls-Royce knocks a red-haired girl off her bicycle. Jean-Claude Vannier's strings, a funk bass, a narrator who speaks more than he sings.

A commercial failure.

Fewer than twenty thousand copies sold at the time. Today it is cited by Beck, Air, Portishead, Jarvis Cocker and David Holmes as a founding record.

The record that failed is the one the musicians still study.

1979: Aux armes et cætera

A Reggae Marseillaise, Paratroopers, and a Manuscript

Kingston, Jamaica. Recorded with Sly and Robbie and Bob Marley's backing singers. The national anthem of France, in reggae, reduced to "et cætera." The reaction. Death threats. Former paratroopers promise to stop the Strasbourg concert of January 1980. The last word. In 1981 he buys Rouget de Lisle's original manuscript at auction — and points out that the refrain is written "aux armes et cætera."

He insulted the anthem, then proved he knew it better than his accusers. That is the Gainsbourg move.

Gainsbarre

The Double, the Banknote, and the Television Years

Gainsbourg

Composer and arranger. Melody Nelson, the Bardot and Birkin songs, the craft.

Gainsbarre

Unshaven, drunk, on television. Burns a 500-franc note in 1984, propositions Whitney Houston in 1986.

The character paid the bills and devoured the author.

PART 3

THE MYTH AND THE SHADOW

Lemon Incest, the Wall on Rue de Verneuil, and the Fabrication of a Legend

The Shadow: Lemon Incest, 1984

A duet with his daughter. Charlotte Gainsbourg is twelve. The melody is Chopin's Étude No.

The defence. He insisted the song was about a love that is never consummated. Many listeners, then and now, do not accept the distinction.

What we do with it. Neither erase it nor excuse it. It belongs to the record, next to the genius.

The provocateur knew exactly where the line was. That is why he crossed it.

5 bis, rue de Verneuil

The house he kept as a black museum of himself — untouched since 1991, opened to the public in 2023. The outside wall is a living fresco of fans' messages.

The Catalogue

Some five hundred songs, for Gréco, Adjani, Deneuve, Hardy, Birkin, Bardot, Vanessa Paradis. Sampled, covered and studied by three generations.

The Posthumous Design

He staged his own legend — the Gitanes, the Repetto shoes, the refusal to be liked — so that death would only confirm it.

He wrote the myth himself, then let France finish the sentence.

2 March 1991

A Death, a President, and a Cemetery

Rue de Verneuil.

A fifth heart attack, at sixty-two. Fans gather at the door within hours and begin to write on the wall.

The State speaks.

President Mitterrand: “He was our Baudelaire, our Apollinaire. He elevated song to the level of art.” The provocateur is buried at Montparnasse, among the poets.

The afterlife.

Charlotte, Jane, Lulu; the house; the biopic; the samples. The man who said song was a minor art is now taught as literature.

The ugliest man in French song became its most beautiful legend — on purpose.

Sixty-Two Years in One Hour

A child who hid under the yellow star made hiding, and revealing, his art.

A painter who failed gave popular song the discipline of composition.

A face he hated became the most recognisable silhouette in France.

And every scandal was a stage — including the ones we cannot forgive.

He asked to be remembered for the craft. He made sure we would remember the scandals too.

Sources & Further Reading

Reading

Gilles Verlant, Gainsbourg (biography) · Sylvie Simmons, Serge Gainsbourg: A Fistful of Gitanes · Jane Birkin, Munkey Diaries · Maison Gainsbourg (museum catalogue, 2023).

Listening, in Order

Du chant à la une! (1958) · Histoire de Melody Nelson (1971) · L'Homme à tête de chou (1976) · Aux armes et cætera (1979) · Love on the Beat (1984).

Watching

Gainsbourg (Vie héroïque), Joann Sfar (2010) · Slogan, Pierre Grimblat (1969) · The 1980 Strasbourg Marseillaise footage · Jane B. par Agnès V. (1988).